The Prize That Wasn't

One evening, Hajurama's phone rang. A polite young man said she had won a motorbike in a mobile company's lucky draw. "To send the prize," he said, "we only need the six-digit code that has just come to your phone."

Hajurama had never entered a lucky draw, but a motorbike would be a fine gift for her grandson Prabin. She was reading out the first two numbers when Prabin came in from his tuition class and heard her.

He took the phone gently and ended the call. Then he showed her the message on the screen. It said, "Do not share this code with anyone. Our staff will never ask for it."

"That code is the key to your mobile wallet, Hajurama," he explained. "With it, he could have taken all the money your son sent from Qatar."

That night Prabin turned on a PIN for her wallet app and wrote three rules on a card beside the phone: never share a code, never trust a prize you didn't enter for, and when in doubt, call Prabin. Hajurama laughed, but she kept the card there.

i. Hajurama had entered the mobile company's lucky draw. ☐

ii. The message on the phone warned her not to share the code with anyone. ☐

iii. Prabin wrote the rules in a notebook. ☐
